

Real Estate Investment Trusts to Hedge the Stock and Bond Markets

With the credit crunch and the market crash, consider adding REITs to your investment portfolio to help offset the damage done to other investments

Detroit, MI – Perhaps you've been studying your investment portfolio and to your dismay, you've noticed how much the value has declined in the past year. According to Earl E Bird, III, spokes person for the REITbuyer.com, an online stock brokerage, REITs are always a wise investment.

Earl joined a group of real estate investors at a meeting where the conversation was about the declining real estate market and the condition of the stock market. Earl is an expert in REITs; he explained, "REITs are Real Estate Investment Trusts. There are a variety of REITs out there, which are investments where you fund a real estate management company. Some are an opportunity to back real estate developers who are taking on new ventures in construction. Others are meant to fund the management of residential real estate such as apartment complexes, condominiums or even neighborhoods. There are also REITs that operate commercial real estate interests."

Earl went on to explain how REITs work, their benefits, expected returns and where investors can go to research REITs and learn more about them. "There is a wealth of information, articles, graphs and more on the website, <http://www.reitbuyer.com> that investors can learn from. The information is very easy to understand and I recommend it to all new real estate investors as well as the very experienced," said Earl.

"As Louis J. Glickman said, 'The best investment on earth is earth,'" said Earl. "Adding a REIT or two to your portfolio would offer you a little more diversity and security in your investments."

Real estate investors can learn about REITs at the REITBuyer.com. REITbuyer.com is an online brokerage information site specializing In REITs and Real Estate Mutual Funds – The World's first and only site dedicated to REITs Real Estate Mutual Funds. This is a place for the small investor to own a piece of world class real estate.
